Qube response to ACCC inquiry into acquisition of Newcastle Agri Terminal (NAT)

Responding to the announcement today by the ACCC regarding Qube's recent acquisition of the Newcastle Agri Terminal, a spokesperson for Qube said, "We are disappointed that the ACCC has chosen to continue with this inquiry.

Qube advised the ACCC of the transaction in early September. Qube has also worked closely and constructively with the ACCC's grain monitoring unit over a number of years. However, the commercial arrangements between the parties did not allow for any further delay in completion of the transaction.

Qube believes the transaction does not raise material competition issues however will continue to provide every assistance to the Commission to allow it to complete its inquiries.

The Newcastle Agri Terminal is a world class grain export facility. The acquisition provides Qube with geographical diversity and enhanced service capability to service traders and grain exporters in the Newcastle market.

The deal also provides an opportunity for Qube to invest in the terminal to deliver a larger and more efficient facility – providing customers in the Northern draw zone with a strong and independent competitive alternative to Graincorp's terminal.

The existing management team is continuing to operate the terminal.

Qube is grateful for the support it has received from traders and existing NAT customers, who have recognised the benefits the deal offers to the Newcastle grain supply chain."
